

BIEN NACIDO BRANDS ITSELF

December 30, 2011 | Steve Heimoff

Another iconic name also has started a brand: Bien Nacido. Everybody knows them as one of the greatest vineyards in California, if not the New World. The designation “Bien Nacido Vineyard,” on dozens of wines from some of the state’s most prestigious wineries, is as close to an assurance of a very good wine as any vineyard designation can be. But the Miller family, who own Bien Nacido, have decided to launch their own brand, under the same name.

They faced similar but slightly different challenges from Wilson Daniels. For starters, should they call the brand Bien Nacido, or something different? Calling it Bien Nacido could cause some confusion out there in the marketplace, and might be seen as competing against the clients they sell grapes to. But they decided to call it Bien Nacido, and who am I to argue with that? It’s a fine name, and it would have been silly not to take advantage of it, in my opinion.

The Millers, however, did what Wilson Daniels didn’t: they came out with expensive wines. I’ve reviewed only two so far: the Syrah and the Pinot Noir, both from 2007. Both cost $52. The Syrah is awesome; I scored it 96 points. I gave the Pinot 90 points, but the truth is, it could be better today than when I reviewed it, last March. Bien Nacido also took the bold, ambitious step of hiring one of the foremost winemakers in California, Trey Fletcher, whom they lured away from Littorai. I think that testifies to their ambition to play at the highest level of which they’re capable, which is a very high level, indeed. After all, they won’t have any problem obtaining the best Bien Nacido fruit! There’s this consideration, too: having decided to brand the wines under the Bien Nacido name, the Millers certainly could not have released ordinary wine; that would have tarnished the Bien Nacido name they’ve spent so long burnishing.
